

How to Make Coal

Biocoal is a synthetic coal with properties similar to natural coal. Several companies are engaged in the business of producing biocoal. The process, sometimes called hydrothermal carbonization, uses superheated water under pressure to produce biocoal from plant waste in a few hours. This shows that natural coal could be produced in a short time under the right conditions of heat and pressure in the presence of water.

Biocoal pellets

Image: © Paul Terry - PTCreative 2014